After taking the test, I've learned that I prefer logical thinking rather than following my feelings, I've learned that even though there is a preference between the three factors (E,T,&J), it is only a slight difference than the other. I believe that the reason behind this is because I make my actions based on the situation. There are times that I prefer to use my head than what I feel and vice-versa. When it comes to my plans for the future, I prefer the future than the current situation. I focus myself on what is the best outcome that I could achieve from different possibilities and opportunities that I could think of. But when I interviewed my loved ones, I realized that I always come up late from my appointments. As I reflect upon myself, I realized that I always take time to make a good appearance to others. I take my time doing my hair or putting my clothes on. I may not be that sociable, but I am conscious about what I look like or what they would see in me. Even though I want myself to be good-looking, I don't prefer to party with other people.

Extravert (9%) – Although there is a higher preference than being introvert, I believe that I may be good at socializing with other people, but I prefer to be alone and watch movies by myself but I would prefer to watch it with someone.

Intuitive (34%) – There are times when I would lose my chance to achieve something because I was always forward-looking. But there are also times that I achieve better outcomes because of my perception.

Thinking (9%) – When I was young, I always make my actions based on what I feel, but as time goes by, I've learned that most of the time, rational thinking is better than following what you want. "Needs over wants", just like what they say. But a small difference means that there are also times that my feelings win over my thinking.

Judging (6%) – When there are times that I need to choose, I usually prefer those that's in my principles. I move to what I think is right and sometimes, something that would benefit me.
