Reflection

What I learned from the interview and to the result is that they're pretty much the same. A friend of mine said that I'm trying hard to be part of the peers. It's because I feel left out and will end up alone in the future if I don't act now. She also said that I'm a little bit exaggerated sometimes, maybe because I'm not really used to talking to people that I can't control myself. She also perceives me as pessimistic, I think the reason for that is because I was scared of the possibilities that everything will end up worse because I'm not really familiar yet to it but surely afterwards I can live up to my decisions. She added that I'm soft-hearted, gentleman and funny. I guess that's the reason or rather that's my way to socialize to people, I don't want them to see me at my worst nor they see me succumbing to sadness just because I can't act right. I want them to just accept me for who I am, that this is who I am. I'm not perfect, and I'm proud of it.

(Introversion or Extraversion) - Surely my personality of being an introvert is slightly higher than being an extrovert, I always thought that I'm an ambivert (Half introvert, Half extrovert), but since time flies nothing is permanent but change.

(Intuition or Sensing) - I'm somehow living to expectations so that's why I'm Intuitive, I'm always prepared for the worse and for the best circumstances.

(Feeling or Thinking) - There's not much of difference between my IQ and EQ level, because I don't usually put my feelings in logical reasoning, nor reasons in my feelings. So it's quite balanced.

(Judging or Perceiving) - I always abide the law but sometimes I see flaws about the rules and regulations of the world that seems not right.

Overall, what I thought that I am was not really that accurate to the way that I act. This test and Interview further enlightened me of who I really am. I'm a mixture of positivity and negativity, which I feel, made me humane.
